NOTES

The above chart gives the names of approved paint colours from 4 different paint brands. You are not required to use any of the brands below, but any other brands will need the colour to be determined by computer matching as the colour names cannot be reliably compared from one brand name to another.

Explanatory Notes

Basic Colours

The main body colours of buildings are: -

- a) natural finish brick, stone or galvanised iron
- b) stucco or cement render, either untreated or finished in a stucco wash of what was intended to be a Bath stone or other light stone colour;
- c) paintwork in various shades of cream; and
- d) Less commonly, paintwork in Indian Red and various shades of brown

The stucco wash would give a matt finish, and the paint colours should be taken to be in a low sheen or at most, a semi-gloss.

Joinery Colours

A wider range of colours, and a more glossy finish, are appropriate to door and window joinery, verandah posts, valances, bargeboard, ornamental works, signwriting, trimmings and metal fittings. This range includes the basic paint colours named above, as well as black and dark tints, off white, chrome green and Prussian blue.

Small-scale Signwriting

For smaller scale signwriting and ornamental work, especially on shop windows, there is no limitation upon the acceptable range of colours, and gold and silver lead decorative etching or painted white stippled background to lettering are also appropriate.

Roof Colours

Special roof paints were available in the nineteenth century in a variety of colours including Portland stone, lead, slate, yellow, green, red and other shades. Nevertheless it should not be taken that these are all appropriate colours for general use; the green was the most expensive, and presumably less common in consequence, while Portland stone was said to be most commonly used. It is considered that the brighter colours were not common, and the appropriate colours are light stone, slate grey and Indian red.

Fence Colours

Appropriate colours for fences, gates, etc are those set out for walls in the schedule, with similar restriction on the use of bright colours on surfaces facing High Street, Echuca within the Area of Historic and Landscape Interest. Off-white is also an appropriate colour. Treatment of timber fences, gates, etc with oil or similar stain is also appropriate in many cases.

(Note: A body colour is a colour which covers the greater part of the area of a wall.)
